

Fleetwood Mac Live 2013 marks the band's first tour since 2009, and while they won't be pushing a new album, the trek will come on the heels of the massive reissue of their 1977 classic Rumours that's filled with unreleased live and studio material, and a DVD of the 1977 documentary The Rosebud Film. Fleetwood Mac is heading back on the road, and that means the top-selling group will release new music – sort of... Stevie Nicks recently sang on tracks that Lindsey Buckingham, Mick Fleetwood and John McVie worked on, calling the sessions “great.” But Nicks also says she’s not sure where the band fits in today’s music industry. “Whether or not we’re gonna do any more (songs), we don’t know because we’re so completely bummed out with the state of the music industry and the fact that nobody even wants a full record,” she said. “Everybody wants two songs, so we’re going to give them two songs.” Nicks said depending on the response to the new tracks – which Buckingham calls “the most Fleetwood Mac-y stuff ... in a long time” – more material could come next... “Maybe we’ll get an EP out of it or something,” Buckingham said.
